

Hello World: Is Your Government Driving You Crazy?

By Jon Rappaport | No More Fake News

Editor's Note: Politicians will all tell you that they are the best choice for president, senator, congressperson, etc. Yet, when you really look at their voting records, after they have been elected, you may be shocked to see how many times they have voted contrariwise to their campaign promises or party line – one of the very reasons you voted for them in the first place. Journalist Jon Rappaport has a great take on this which will help you to see the electoral process in a better light. Yet, his is not a merely earth-bound perspective. He looks at how we mentally, emotionally, and even spiritually project energy on to our favorite politicians and how the way we view our politicians allows them to keep lying. He shows you how you can change your attitude toward politics and in effect change the world – for the better.

[Author's] Note: If, as you read this article, you think I'm saying 'don't worry, be happy' or 'just laugh it off' or 'forget all the suffering in the world,' you're viewing it from the wrong angle. The 1968 riot at the Democratic National Convention was very serious, and it did nothing to shorten the war in Vietnam. It might have prolonged it. In this article, I'm talking about a basic psychological and spiritual inhibition that keeps people from a kind of mass reaction they believe is unthinkable—but a reaction that would change reality in a revolutionary fashion, if it came from their deepest core...

I could write a few thousand pages as a mere introduction—but I want to focus on one factor: what people project into their leaders.

Yes, I know, that sounds a bit odd. But stay with me. I'll make it pay off.

For example, in the US, Republican voters and supporters project a huge amount of faith and energy into their Republican leaders. If you could see this, you would be watching a stunning "light show." I'm talking about streamers and arrows and rays of energy.

And in this particular light show, there are messages: defund Planned Parenthood; cut off money for massive migration programs; stop Obamacare funding; don't give money to the climate change payout program; stop bankrolling sanctuary cities.

That's what these Republicans want from their leaders. That's what they're projecting with great insistence.

And this isn't some kind of misplaced crazy light show, because guess what? Republicans control the US House of Representatives by a wide margin. Republicans: 246. Democrats: 188.

So when a massive federal spending bill ($1.1 trillion) comes up for a vote, as it just has, Republican Congress members can call the shots. They can respond to all those light rays being projected at them by their supporters all over the land. They can do it in a second. No problem. They can make their people happy. They can carry out their people's wishes.

But...they didn't. In fact, they just voted to fund all those programs I just mentioned. They pulled a vast switch. That's right. That would be like all those Stars Wars characters, with their light sabers, suddenly projecting them through the movie screen right back at their adoring audience in the theater and burning them. What a message that would be.

Has your government ever done something like this in your country? I bet they have.

When it happens, the people, the voters, the supporters, who were sure their leaders would respond to them...well, to say they're shocked would be a vast understatement.

However, scanning the newspapers and news broadcasts in America today, so far I find no reports of massive Republican demonstrations in the streets. Millions marching on Washington DC? Thousands? Hundreds? Dozens? Four? Two?

One guy in a Star Wars costume with a light saber trying to stop traffic on Pennsylvania Avenue?

Try to imagine the amount of energy and faith Republicans in America have been expending and projecting at their leaders—with this Big Switch as the result.

And then consider this: the Republicans in the US House of Representatives—many of them—never intended to go to war over this massive budget bill. It was never in the cards. They wear special shields, and the shields ward off all the projected rays coming at them from their faithful flock.

It's not just the Republicans, in case you think I'm taking sides. What about the huge Democratic support for the invasion of Iraq under George W Bush? Did you see a few million Democrats in the streets right after the nearly unanimous Congressional vote to launch the planes and send the troops?

Wherever you live in the world, I'm sure you've seen this sort of thing. "Vote for Joe. He'll do this and that." Joe wins, and then doesn't do either this or that. He was never going to. He was always wearing one of those shields that protected him from what his supporters were projecting at him.
