Astrology Overview for September 11-17, 2017

The week begins with the Sun squaring with Saturn. This can be one of the most restrictive and frustrating of all astrological angles, it's going to be important this week that we nail down the detail of things but don't try to go quicker than circumstances allow.

For example avoid shortcuts. They are unlikely to render many results. If you're working towards any targets, travel check all the information involved. This is not a time to enter into frivolous agreements. With Mercury combining with Mars in Virgo, we are given an extra chance to really bring precision to all that we do, for the soon as we spread ourselves too thinly, our energy could drop and it can be a case of diminishing returns.

The great news is that Mercury is now finding his feet back in Virgo and this of course is one of the 2 zodiac signs that he rules. By early next week Mercury will return to the point where the retrograde 1st began on 11th August coming out of shadow and any glitches that have occurred in the interim period can start to be resolved.

The interesting thing about this week and the overall solar horoscope is the role of Venus which forges three very positive angles, firstly with Saturn then Jupiter and finally Uranus. Of course Jupiter and Uranus have recently been in opposition and that does continue. This can stir up a more rebellious side of our nature, however Venus can be a real soothing influence, and charisma can burn brightly with these combinations. But also if there is a sincere relationship developing in our situations this can be strengthened to. Alternatively we may look to reinvigorate an existing relationship. If that is the case, a fairer share of domestic chores would certainly be a great way to go forwards.

Finally this week's Quarter Moon on Wednesday is in Gemini. Once more this just encourages us not to try too hard, to be distracted or to get too tense if we are trying to be more productive after all there are only so many hours in the day.
